

it would save the expense of a special competition.

The holding of but one competition for qualifying would open the door to the possibility of, say, one or two of our undoubtedly best players failing to gain a place, simply because they happened to be "off" on that particular day.

We would be bound to have to abide by the result, and we would have some grouching.

With the adoption of the 3 course idea, the possibility of the happening ^{en} just mentioned is quite remote.

We would have our best team decided by the result, and those numbers who have an inflated idea of their own prowess, and who grumble yearly because they have not been picked to play, will be effectively silenced.

If you talk my idea over with J. and B. Dunn, and between you come to the conclusion that its adoption would answer the purpose, why not drop a card to each member informing him, and pointing out that it incorporates
